Google Maps has deleted, or is trying to delete, an entire 18-mile stretch of Highway 1 on California's Central Coast. The highway cuts across Monterey Bay and is in part home to the Carmel River estuary. The coast side of the road has been removed, but the north side remains intact. Google has given no explanation, according to the California Coastal Commission. Earlier this week, California's Coastal Commission reminded Google of its map-making guidelines, which stipulate that coastal areas must be mapped "with an eye for... visual beauty, historic or other significance." The commission also raised the possibility that removing the entire road violated the state Coastal Act, which prohibits development that "substantially changes" the character of coastal areas. Last month, Google Maps tried to delete the highway completely, leaving only a few small sections of coastline. A Google spokesperson told CNN that the company never received an official notice from the commission, and that its incorrect map was the result of a "human error." "We have taken down that particular view in error. We are removing the incorrect view from our Google Maps and Google Earth APIs, and we are working to roll out a corrected view as quickly as possible," the spokesperson said in a statement. "We appreciate the importance of correct data, and appreciate the California Coastal Commission's proactive notification to us and quick follow up." A variety of photonic devices are fabricated on the surface of an insulator using ultraviolet (UV) radiation to create a line of material (a waveguide) which has a different refractive index than the substrate. Within the waveguide, the refractive index is constant along the waveguide. Incident lightwaves are then coupled into the waveguide by total internal reflection, through the substrate. If the refractive index of the waveguide is sufficiently lower than the index

I am using two different models to generate pages for two different sections of my app. The front end will link to either the home or main pages using an if else block. My problem is the if else block keeps creating new instances of my'shows' model when I load a page. this is my if else statement... can anyone help? A: You should be able to pull the logic in to an if else block: 4bc0debe42
